Course overview

Medical editing for peer-reviewed journals will cover the fundamentals of English-language editing for articles being submitted to peer-reviewed journals. At the end of the course, attendees will have a solid foundation to edit the work of other researchers or to improve the quality of their own research articles.

Benefits of attending

- Improve the readability of papers written by researchers writing in a second language
- Tailor research papers to the targeted journals
- Ensure that pertinent information is included in the research paper and that the results and discussion sections are fully supported
- Write an abstract that stands out and clearly discusses the importance of the research at hand

Who should attend?

- Experienced medical writers who are new to medical editing
- Researchers interested in improving the readability of their research papers
- New medical writers wanting to expand their skill set
- Healthcare professionals interested in using their clinical knowledge to support the research community
